Justified text

Lines that end at the right edge of the box, whatever they hold.

Plain

A harbor keeps its own time. The tide comes in when it is ready, the boats leave when the light allows, and the people on the quay learn to read the water the way others read a clock. Every line of this paragraph but the last ends exactly at the right edge of its box.

Spans

The keepers wrote every evening in the record, in a hand that changed every few years, and the oldest entries were kept in a cupboard with spare wicks, glass chimneys and one brass bell. A span or a ~~strike~~ moves with its neighbours, and so does a bold one that follows another.

Footnote

The oldest keeper claimed that she could tell the season from the smell of the oil alone[1], and she was seldom wrong, though nobody ever asked her to prove it[2] in front of the board.

One word

Lamp light tide wick bell

Long words

Extraordinarily unreasonable circumstances shortly necessitated misunderstandings, so a few small words follow here and fill a line which is justified as usual.

Exact fit and short

One short line

Two

[1] Whale oil in winter, colza in spring, and later the paraffin the lighthouse board sent.

[2] She was asked once, in 1874, and got every month right.
